According to German tradition, the cellar (German: Keller) of the town hall (German: Rathaus) is rented for use as a restaurant and beer parlour.

The Ratskeller of the city of Saarbrücken was designed by the same architect as the new town hall, Prof. von Hauberrisser. Due to dissent between the architect, the town council, and the involved artists, the restaurant was completed nine years later than the town hall, in 1909.

After having been damaged in the Second World war, the heavy floods nearly completely destroyed the building in 1947/48. However, the city as well as the prospective innkeeper invested heavily to reconstruct the building, which has been modernized several times since then.
